

THE “METAVERSE” DECEIT

Down The Rabbit Hole We Go!

Personal Sovereignty Series - Article #3 - Val Jon Farris, 1.10.2023

This third article in my Metaverse series, (link here: <https://travelerswithin.com/metaverse-deceit/>) is for all the naysayers out there who remain steadfast and loyal to the mainstream deceptions they are being spoon-fed. I was encouraged this week when a longtime Facebook “friend” replied to my recent posts with, “I’m tired of your adverse theories and won’t stay tuned any longer.”

Why I’m encouraged is because once the resistance starts against an idea whose time has come, it’s an indication that its time is actually coming. Only those ideas and movements that are vehemently resisted, negated, and chastised have the power to make a difference in the world. Why? Because to use an old cliché, while “the truth will set us free,” it’s usually only after it “pisses us off.” Historically people need something or someone to hate and rally against to take action . . . and often what they initially resist and react against, they eventually align with. (For example, in counseling sessions, my clients are often dumbfounded to learn that they turned out exactly like the parent they despised and told themselves they would never be like.)

In this article, I want to take us “down the rabbit hole” further so the degree to which we are being watched, manipulated, and controlled becomes vividly clear. Let’s start with meta-surveillance. As I mentioned in article #1, the number of video cameras monitoring us has exponentially increased in the last five years to over 100 million in America and over 1 billion worldwide.

I know, I know . . . the increased surveillance, (along with the audio eavesdropping and GPS tech built into our phones, and detailed transaction tracking and programmable RFID tagging coded into our credit and debit cards) are additional security measures designed solely for our protection. And while it’s true that terrorists, hackers, scammers, and criminals can exploit us, it’s also true that all our private data, including our consumer interests, political and social dispositions, affiliations and associations, and virtually every other single move we make can be scrutinized down to a three-meter radius. And with the coming of mandatory vaccinations, facial recognition protocols, digital passports, and RFID-enabled license plates, not only can we be precisely tracked, we can be immobilized and locked down at the first signs of suspected dissidence. (Check out this link for some eye-opening digital surveillance facts from the standpoint of those who claim to be protecting us. (Link: <https://spectrum.ieee.org/capitol-riot>)

But there is even more ominous news . . . if you haven’t looked into what is called “database vectoring” I suggest you do so. This new AI data-gathering technology crucially differs from relational databases. Relational searches require an exact text string match, whereas vector searches take into account multiple criteria from diverse sources, and more importantly, they enable the gathering of and analysis of non-text media such as photos, videos, and audio recordings. How this is being accomplished is vital to understand. In your cell phone, you have the option to attach descriptive text that documents say, where and when the pic was taken, who was in it, and even a summary of why it was taken. What you may not realize is that all digital media both on our cell phones and uploaded and posted to the internet will soon be equipped with clandestine embedded encoding, whether we choose it or not. (Here's a link: <https://techgenix.com/rise-of-vector-databases/>)

What this means is that every media recording you have ever made and will ever make will be analyzed, categorized, and used to build your meta-profile, which will be accessible by those who intend on using it to monitor your degree of compliance, and if they deem necessary, place access and mobility controls on you. And there's more . . .

This new technology is also capable of fabricating a virtual visual and auditory profile for you. At CES last week, some of the new biometric technology was unveiled that included the ability to totally recreate a person's physical image along with an exact match of their voice. What this means is that the curse of misinformation we've all witnessed on the internet and television has magnified to the point that the real truth can never be discerned about anything. This paves the way for an exponential leap in the ability to falsify evidence and makes character assassination as easy as a sniper pulling the trigger. Wikipedia has already assassinated every single professional who has spoken out against the government and institutions pushing their global domination agenda by accusing them of intentionally misleading the public. (Look up any medical professional or scientist who has blown the whistle on the ruse of the COVID vaccines and you will see what I mean.)

And if you think these invasions of privacy and violation of our civil liberties are something you can fight through protests and rallies, think again. If enough people do wake up and take to the streets, they will be greeted by something called "Active Denial Technology," a crowd control heat ray weapon designed to "minimize casualties." Now I'm really off my rocker, right? (Check out this US government press room link: https://jnlwp.defense.gov/Portals/50/Documents/Press_Room/Fact_Sheets/ADT_Fact_Sheet_May_2016.pdf)

But hey, I must be fabricating these adverse theories for some self-serving reason, yes? And really now, the "meta-rabbit hole" can't be as deep and dark as I'm making it out to be, right? It's just innovation and inevitable technological progress . . . nothing to be alarmed about. Well, like the Oracle in the Matrix told Neo . . . "Here, have a cookie. By the time you finish eating it, everything will be as right as rain." ~
